

Eating Expo: The Food Culture of Montreal in the 1960s

Rhona Richman Kenneally
Assistant Professor, Design Art

One of the most intimate ways we interact with the world around us is by eating. And the world came to Montreal in 1967. Did you, by any chance, go to Expo? Do you remember, or do you know someone who remembers, what the food tasted like? Did your family celebrate a special occasion at one of Expo's many restaurants?

Even if you never participated in Expo's amazing food fest, this is a chance to explore one of the most exciting moments in the history of Montreal, and to understand better why our city has such a healthy and vibrant food culture today.

Your Opinion Matters: What are your Expos food memories?

Do you have a food memory that links back to Expo 67—a story, a souvenir menu or spoon, a photograph (people looked different 37 years ago!)? Were you interested in tasting international food, or fast foods, that were for sale at Expo, and then trying to reproduce them at home? Your memories are not just nostalgia: they can help us understand how much we learn about food and eating from many different sources. Let Rhona know! You can email her at (rrk@alcor.concordia.ca) or you can bring your treasure along to the DeSève Cinema on October 26, where it will be photographed and documented. Remember, YOUR experiences count!

Tuesday, October 26
4:30 pm – 5:30 pm

J.A. DeSève Cinema – J.W. McConnell Building
Concordia University – 1400 de Maisonneuve Blvd. West

Admission: Free
Tickets: At the door
Info: 848-2424 ext. 4880

Concordia
UNIVERSITY

Real education for the real world
www.concordia.ca

CBCtelevision

